My child is very forgetful and struggles to focus. Could this be ADHD, and what should I do?

Forgetfulness and difficulty focusing can be common in children, but they can also be signs of various factors, including ADHD. If you're concerned, it's best to consult a pediatrician or a mental health professional who can evaluate your child's behavior and offer guidance. They can offer strategies, recommend further evaluation if needed, and provide support for both your child and your family.

How might restlessness in a highly creative person differ from restlessness in someone who is overwhelmed by stress?

Restlessness can manifest differently depending on the individual and the situation. In a highly creative person, restlessness may be fueled by a constant flow of ideas and a desire to explore new projects. However, in someone overwhelmed by stress, restlessness may be accompanied by physical tension, difficulty concentrating, and a sense of being unable to relax. Understanding the underlying reasons for restlessness can help in finding appropriate coping strategies, whether it's channeling creativity or reducing stress levels.

What are some signs of ADHD in preschoolers, and how can parents support them?

In preschoolers, signs of ADHD may include excessive physical activity, difficulty following instructions, impulsivity, and challenges with transitions or social interactions. Parents can support their child by establishing routines, providing clear and simple instructions, creating a calm environment, and encouraging activities that channel their energy in a positive way. If concerns persist, consulting with a pediatrician or child psychologist can provide further guidance and support.
